CAP. XXVI.

The conclusion of this treatise concerning the right writing of our English tongue.

This is that, which I had to saie concerning the right writing of our English tongue, both for the rules, which I haue obserued in daile experience, and for the table, which I haue collected to confirm that experience. As for the right of my rules, I maie not take vpon me anie more certaintie, then the naturall force of such probable directions doth ordinarily infer, which is to hold commonlie true, and euer most likelie, from which probabilite I wander not far, if my self maie be iudge. As for the table I sought in it, to write all the words generally after an English ear, neuer yeilding much to anie foren letter (sauiug onelie where som pretie occasiō recōmeded vnto me, the duble writing of both the naturall English & the the incorporate strāger. And yet I haue diligēthe examined the originall grounds of our enfranchised terms, which be one third part of our hole speche, tho I hold altogether with our own writing, & follow not their primitiue. For if the word it self be english in dede, the is it best in the naturall hew, if it be a strāger, & incorporate among vs, let it wear our colors, sith it wil be one of vs. In both the rules & table, I haue rather sought, by such an inductiō to stir vp som other to perform the enterpriise, then hoped my self to leaue it cōplet. For it maie so fall out, that I haue hit vpon som truth, tho not vpō all, & again it maie so be, that I haue missed quite, & cut a wrong course, & yet by so doing, that I haue opened a waie vnto som other, by giuing such a light, either to amend my course if it like in part, or to shape a better by it, if it hollie mislike. Further, in both I haue bene verie carefull neuer to depart frō the custom of my cuntrie, by cause I desire either to please with liking, or to mislike without displeasing. For where ane ordinarie custom doth seme of long time to haue made hir own choice, and that vpon good shew, she will either like him that cleaues to hir allowance, or not be displeased, where hir self is not misliked. And if there be anie hope to procure liking in such a thing as custom is to rule, it must nedes com by following, and not by forcing. He enforceth, which quite altereth the common cur-
